SOME RAIN AWAKENED SPURIAS

'Chocolate Rosette' - Dave Niswonger 2007

'Oregon Cream' - Lee Walker 2007

One late September day Spurias awakened from the intense heat and drought to find a better cooler world to emerge and gain rapid growth that establishes them as the tallest iris to grow in Central Texas. The amended soil and heavenly moisture brought them out of dormancy even though their foliage lay over their rhizome since it was never cut in July or August. Now it is time to feed them a balanced fertilizer that you use on roses so that they become green again and reward you with blooms for the show. Those thin sword-shaped leaves are useful in creating beautiful iris arrangements.

'Violet Fusion' - Lee Walker 2005

'Highline Lavender' - Eleanor McCown 1968

WHO ARE IRISARIANS?

Irisarians are special people who love irises, grow irises, amend the soil that irises worship, watch the climate, studies and records to form opinions of irises, and do not consider weeds to be companion plants for irises. In fact, irisarians work every day to maintain a picture perfect garden. Irisarians know their strengths and weaknesses and work to correct their weaknesses. They purchase new irises every year but remember their older varieties that are tried and true and able to resist climate change or survive fires. They keep up with other irisarians and carefully listen for newer trends concerning growing and showing irises. They are always happy when their family, friends, and loved ones win awards with their irises. As artists they can distinguish between an inferior iris and one of great form, bud count, and beauty of bloom. They know that irises constantly change and they can move to better soil as they develop into show stalks.

IRISES IN FLORAL ARRANGEMENTS

Ken Fuchs has presented a detailed ISA newsletter (July/August 2023) concerning floral arrangements using irises for past shows. Now please check out IRISES: THE BULLETIN OF THE AMERICAN IRIS SOCIETY SPRING 2023 for "The Evolution of the AIS Artistic Design Certificate" by Dawn Boyer on page 34-37. Study some of the iris florals that are included. Older issues of the AIS Bulletin have similar articles by Carolyn Hawkins.

HORTICULTURE

As a gardener you have planted all of the irises that you have purchased. Those bearded varieties have green foliage now that you have watered and fed them bone meal. If they are reblooming irises, then they can use more water and food as spring approaches.

Louisiana irises can be planted in a separate area that remains wet or they can be grown in beautiful containers with no holes in the bottom although some tiny holes can be in the very top of the pot to allow rain water to escape to avoid mosquitoes hatching in your yard. These native wild flowers grow in acid soil; therefore, feed with azalea food. During severe winter (15 degrees) protect the plants by covering or turning them over and protecting the area so that they do not freeze. Before winter these plants are mulched and the roots are established while the rhizome is covered.

Spurias can be planted behind the tall bearded irises or in a separate garden that has rose soil and extra rose food to nourish them for healthy leaves and blooms. These irises and their thin leaves do well in forming unusual flower arrangements for the April 13th flower show in the auditorium of Zilker Botanical Garden.

Texas sage, Empress Candlestick, lantana, and crepe myrtle are growing and blooming after the rain that brought hail to Round Rock, Georgetown, and Austin, but not West Lake Hills. After watering and cooler temperatures the gardens are beginning to grow—even weeds are emerging. The tiny rhizomes have green leaves and new growth daily in their huge pot referred to as their nursery. The soil is fertile and the irises are happy.

Enjoy your irises and keep the garden clean. Work happily when cutting away that autumn color from irises.
